Every year, he waits patiently for the first snow to fall. He watches the weather forecast and checks the sky every day. When the snow finally comes, he runs outside and throws his arms up in the air. He loves the way the snow feels on his skin and the way it crunches beneath his feet.

One day, the boy is playing in the snow when he sees a group of children building a snowman. He wants to help, but he doesn't know how. The children are much older than he is, and they don't seem to want his help. But the boy is determined to be a part of the fun.

He goes home and gets his shovel. He starts to build his own snowman, but it doesn't look like the ones the other children are building. His snowman is small and lopsided, but he is proud of it. He puts a scarf around its neck and a hat on its head.

When the other children see his snowman, they start to laugh. They tell him that his snowman is ugly and that he should go away. The boy is heartbroken. He doesn't understand why the other children are being so mean.

But then, something amazing happens. The wind picks up and starts to blow the snow around. The snow gets into the eyes of the other children, and they start to rub their eyes and cry. The boy's snowman, however, is protected by the scarf and hat. The snow doesn't get into its eyes, and it stands tall and proud.

The other children are amazed. They realize that the boy's snowman is the best one of all. They apologize for being mean, and they ask the boy to help them build their snowman. The boy is happy to help, and together they build a beautiful snowman that everyone can enjoy.
