The Life and Work of Arthur Bartow

Arthur Bartow was born in London in 1924. He studied architecture at the University of Cambridge and the Royal Academy Schools. After graduating, he worked for several architectural firms before starting his own practice in 1955. Bartow's early work was influenced by the modernist movement, but he soon developed his own unique style. He was particularly interested in using concrete and steel to create buildings that were both functional and expressive.

Bartow's first major commission was the National Library of Australia in Canberra. The library is a massive, brutalist building that has been praised for its innovative design and its use of natural light. The library was completed in 1968 and has since become one of Australia's most iconic buildings.

In the 1970s, Bartow began to move away from brutalism and towards a more sculptural style. His work from this period includes the Barbican Centre in London and the Pompidou Centre in Paris. The Barbican Centre is a complex of residential buildings, theaters, and art galleries. The Pompidou Centre is a museum of modern and contemporary art. Both buildings are characterized by their bold use of color and form.

Bartow continued to work until his death in 2007. He left behind a legacy of over 100 buildings, which are located all over the world. His work has been praised for its originality, its functionality, and its commitment to social and environmental responsibility.
