One of the most harrowing accounts is that of Edith Russell, a first-class passenger who was traveling with her husband and two children. Russell described how she was awakened by a loud noise and felt the ship shuddering violently.

"I jumped out of bed and ran to my husband's cabin," Russell recalled. "He was already dressed and told me to get the children and go up on deck."

Russell and her children made their way to the boat deck, where they boarded lifeboat 11. The lifeboat was lowered into the water, and Russell and her children were rowed away from the sinking ship.

"I could see the Titanic going down," Russell said. "It was a terrible sight. I could hear people screaming and crying."

Russell and her children were eventually rescued by the RMS Carpathia, which had arrived on the scene to search for survivors.

Another survivor, Lawrence Beesley, a journalist who was traveling in first class, described how he helped to load women and children into lifeboats.

"I saw a group of women and children standing on the deck," Beesley recalled. "I asked them if they wanted to get into a lifeboat, and they said yes."

Beesley helped the women and children into the lifeboat, and then he got in himself. The lifeboat was lowered into the water, and Beesley and the others rowed away from the sinking ship.

"I could see the Titanic going down," Beesley said. "It was a terrible sight. I could hear people screaming and crying."

Beesley and the others in the lifeboat were eventually rescued by the RMS Carpathia.

The stories of Edith Russell and Lawrence Beesley are just two examples of the many harrowing accounts that were told by survivors of the Titanic disaster.

These stories provide a firsthand look at the chaos and heroism that unfolded on that fateful night, and they serve as a reminder of the human cost of this tragedy.

Lessons Learned from the Titanic Disaster

The Titanic disaster was a tragedy, but it also taught us some valuable lessons about maritime safety. In the years since the sinking, new regulations have been put in place to make ships safer and to improve the chances of survival in the event of a disaster.

Here are some of the lessons that we have learned from the Titanic disaster:

- Ships should be designed with enough lifeboats for everyone on board.
- Lifeboats should be launched promptly and in an orderly manner.
- Passengers and crew should be trained in emergency procedures.
- Ships should be equipped with enough life jackets for everyone on board.
- Ships should be equipped with emergency beacons to help rescuers locate them in the event of a disaster.

These lessons have helped to make ships safer and to improve the chances of survival in the event of a disaster. However, we must never forget the lessons that we have learned from the Titanic disaster, and we must continue to work to improve maritime safety.
