The early 20th century was a time of great change and upheaval. The world was becoming increasingly interconnected, and new technologies were emerging that made it possible to communicate and travel across vast distances. This led to the rise of new forms of global governance, as well as a struggle between different actors for control over the world order.

One of the most important factors in the development of global governance in the early 20th century was the rise of networks. Networks are groups of people or organizations that are connected to each other by ties of communication, trade, or other forms of interaction. Networks can be used to share information, coordinate activities, and build relationships. In the early 20th century, networks played a key role in the development of new forms of global governance.

One example of a network that played a key role in the development of global governance in the early 20th century is the League of Nations. The League of Nations was an international organization that was founded in 1919 after the First World War. The League's goal was to promote peace and cooperation among nations, and it did so by providing a forum for dialogue and negotiation. The League of Nations was the first international organization to be created with a global mandate, and it played a key role in the development of new forms of global governance.

Another example of a network that played a key role in the development of global governance in the early 20th century is the International Chamber of Commerce (ICC). The ICC is a global business organization that was founded in 1919. The ICC's goal is to promote free trade and investment, and it does so by providing a forum for dialogue and cooperation between businesses from around the world. The ICC was one of the first international organizations to be created to represent the interests of business, and it played a key role in the development of new forms of global governance.

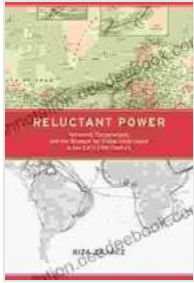

In addition to networks, corporations also played a key role in the development of global governance in the early 20th century. Corporations are large, complex organizations that are owned by shareholders and managed by professional managers. Corporations are able to operate across borders, and they play a major role in the global economy. In the early 20th century, corporations began to play a more active role in global governance, as they became increasingly involved in international trade and investment.

One example of a corporation that played a key role in the development of global governance in the early 20th century is Standard Oil. Standard Oil was a global oil company that was founded in 1870. Standard Oil was one of the first corporations to operate on a global scale, and it played a major role in the development of the global oil industry. Standard Oil also played a role in the development of new forms of global governance, as it was one of the first corporations to create a global network of subsidiaries and affiliates.

Another example of a corporation that played a key role in the development of global governance in the early 20th century is Unilever. Unilever is a global consumer goods company that was founded in 1897. Unilever is one of the largest consumer goods companies in the world, and it plays a major role in the global consumer market. Unilever also played a role in the development of new forms of global governance, as it was one of the first corporations to create a global network of subsidiaries and affiliates.

The rise of networks and corporations in the early 20th century had a profound impact on the world order. Networks and corporations played a key role in the development of new forms of global governance, and their activities helped to shape the world order that we live in today.
